On May 23, 1948, General Isidore was interviewed in New York and described to me his recent conversations in South Africa and London concerning South African uranium. An effort was made in the conversation not to include the names of persons, places or things. Following is a brief summary of his statements to me:

When asked he arrived in South Africa in an entirely unofficial way, stated that he was in South Africa in an entirely unofficial way, and that he could not speak for anyone but himself. He said, nevertheless, he wanted to get Gray's personal opinion. He said that he was sure that he (Gray) had been accused of bad faith in the matter of providing the development of uranium. Gray said that he did not know what South was talking about and had never heard of any such accusations. He stated moreover that impressions in the United States concerning South African activities were based principally upon his reports, and he certainly did not report any such thing. He said that he did report that the investigations in South Africa were on a small scale to achieve the kind of results that would be wanted, but there was no indication of bad faith. At this point, South smiled, and the following discussions were on a very friendly plane.

The following questions were the ones that South was most anxious to have answered:

1) To South African uranium major enough to affect the economy of the country?

Gray replied that he thought it was. (Gold production has been dropping off in South Africa due to shortage of labor and to a lesser extent to increased costs. Gray said he thought uranium might make up the deficiency in income caused by decreased gold production.)

2) What is the relationship concerning uranium between the U.S.A. and U.K.A.?

Gray replied that it was a working partnership. South also said that he was sure that the Americans are our friends now, and I cannot foresee the time that they won't be.

CONVERSATION WITH ARTHUR GRAY CONCERNING SOUTH AFRICA

- 3) Will the U.S.A. and U.K. guarantee that it will take South African uranium production at a reasonable price?

Gray said that he felt sure this was the case.

In discussing the work needed to be done in South Africa to determine more accurately tonnage, grade and price, Smuts asked Gray what he thought out to be done. Gray replied that he would spend half a million dollars on engineering study. Smuts asked whether he thought it could be done for that. Gray said, "without trying to get into a detailed estimate, yes". Smuts then turned to an assistant and said "Let's do it, let's go".

Gray got the impression that Smuts would have been willing to do business then and there.

Gray got the impression in South Africa that the South Africans do not like Bain, Gaudin or Storke. They have the impression that Gaudin has been trying to make a job for himself. They resent being told what to do by Storke. Gray said he was certain that they do not want to send any more big samples of ore to MIT for research purposes. The only basis on which he believes they will countenance further research in the U.S.A. is at their request and under their direction.

Gray mentioned that he was also called into the later discussions in London between Schonland and the U.K. representatives. Schonland asked in the conference what the relationship is between the U.K. and U.S.A. on uranium. He stated that he was going to the U.S. with the firm understanding that a real partnership exists. It is Gray's impression that the present administration in South Africa has clearly cast its lot with the British Commonwealth and that it will deal with the U.S.A. only because of such a partnership.

According to Gray, Schonland is an idealist, a scientist and a strong Nationalist. He is resentful of any hint of foreign interference and is tough on this subject. He is not a dealer or a trader. He will come to the United States expecting some kind of guarantee or assurance that the U.S.A. and U.K. will take South African uranium at a fair price. Gray states that Schonland will not be the administrator of the South African uranium program, but that a different kind of person, a trained operator and administrator will be chosen.

CONVERSATION WITH ANTON GRAY CONCERNING SOUTH AFRICA

Gray thought it psychologically unwise to put a ceiling on the amount of uranium that the U.S.A. and U.K. would guarantee to take and recommended rather that a minimum guaranteed amount be set. (I personally question this judgment.)

Gray promised to be present next month when Schonland is here.
