September 7, 1989 Special Analysis: USSR: The Option of Force in the Baltics

Citation:

"Special Analysis: USSR: The Option of Force in the Baltics", September 7, 1989, Wilson Center Digital Archive, Approved for Release by the Central Intelligence Agency, October 29, 2019.

https://digitalarchive.wilsoncenter.org/document/209463

Summary:

An analysis of the Soviet posture toward the Baltic's movements for greater autonomy.

Original Language:

English

Contents:

Original Scan

Wilson Center Digital Archive

Approved for Release: 2019/10/29 C06826769

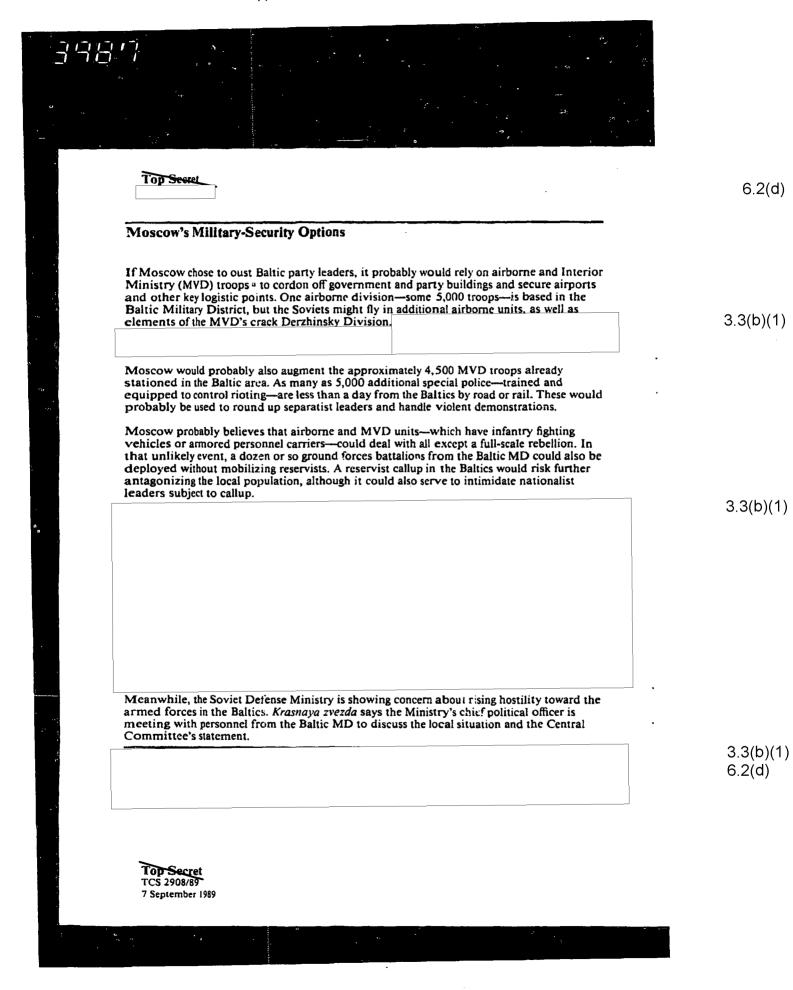

Original Scan

0. . 5.65
		Top Secret	6.2(d)
USSR:	Special Analysis The Option of Force in the Baltic	CS
	republics greater autonomy while President Gorbachev is gambling approach to demands for autonon sentiment, enabling him to avoid his reform program and cost him	ny eventually will erode secessionist a show of force that would cripple international good will. Moscow vent the secession of a Baltic republic of a major military crackdown to wes toward secession. Widespread	6.2(d)
	and economic reforms in the Ba of perestrovka and disavow seces concept of more independent rep reportedly has considered a num scheme for quasi-convertible cu Even the strongly cautionary Ce 26 August affirmed plans the Su allow the Balts to implement rep 1990—a year earlier than anywh plans for republic economic indu statement criticizing the Baltic in nonetheless less conciliatory tha	aber of innovations, including a rrencies for foreign transactions. Intral Committee statement of preme Soviet approved in July to public self-financing in January here else—and to craft more radical ependence. The Central Committee ndependence movement was n many of Gorbachev's past is a Politburo consensus that Baltic	6.2(d)
	No Good Options The Baltic nationalists responded initially to the Central Committee's statement by postponing action on several controversial proposals but, over the long term, will not yield on their plan to use republic sovereignty within the USSR as a prelude to an eventual push for complete statehood.		3.3(b)(1
	The Moscow leadership almost certainly views the use of force as a last resort. Gorbachev last December reportedly ruled out using violent measures against Estonian nationalists and has emphasized his desire to do everything possible to avoid using the military. Some leadership elements, such as party Secretarics Chebrikov and Ligachev, probably would turn more quickly than would Gorbachev		6.2(d)
	11	continued Top Secret TCS 2908/89 7 September 1989
		· · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · ·

Wilson Center Digital Archive

Approved for Release: 2019/10/29 C06826769

Original Scan

Wilson Center Digital Archive

Approved for Release: 2019/10/29 C06826769

Original Scan

Top Secret-

6.2(d)

Gains Made for Baltic Autonomy in 1989

Pre-WW II national anthems, flags reasserted in all three republics.

Popular-front candidates dominate March elections to the Congress of People's Deputies.

National language laws passed in all three republics.

Citizenship laws proposed in Estonia, Lithuania.

USSR Supreme Soviet approves Baltic economic autonomy bill.

Lithuanian party youth organization (Komsomol) severs ties to Moscow.

Lithuanian party announces fall conference to consider cutting ties to CPSU.

Congress of People's Deputies reportedly finds annexation of Baltic republics illegal.

Potential Flashpoints

Outside agitation by reactionary Russian nationalist groups.

Extremists gain control of Popular Fronts.

Baltic parties split along ethnic lines.

Moscow leadership in open conflict over nationality policy.

Pronationalist Baltic party leaders fired.

Nationalist, "parallel" government formed, declares secession.

Widespread intercommunal violence crupts; MVD cannot control.

Soviet troops deployed; martial law declared.

6.2(d)

Top Secret TCS 2908/89 7 September 1989

Approved for Release: 2019/10/29 C06826769

Top Seere 6.2(d) from political means to the use of force, but in the end the entire leadership would agree or the necessity of military action if all other means failed to prevent secession. 6.2(d) The leadership would first exhaust less drastic means. For example, Gorbachev could deprive activists of important advocates in Moscow by removing nationalist-minded officials, such as Lithuanian party chief Brazauskas or Estonian premier Toome. Or, central ministries could be directed to exert economic pressure by delaying the delivery of fuel or blocking foreign financial ventures. Alternatively, Moscow might cinphasize its disapproval by increasing the presence and visibility of security (MVD and KGB) personnel or military units in the Baltics, hoping to cow dissenters and forestall a major bloodletting. In April the appearance of a few armored personnel carriers in Riga during a routine military command staff exercise reportedly discomfited Latvian nationalists. 6.2(d) Moscow recognizes that these options carry the risk of provoking demonstrations and escalating into a situation ultimately trapping the central leadership into sending troops. The risk is less, however, than that associated with a general crackdown in the Baltic republics, which would be held in reserve as a last resort. A crackdown could force Gorbachev to retreat on the decentralizing aspects of his domestic reform program and sharpen nationality problems elsewhere in the country. It would also cost him much of the international good will derived from his diplomatic initiatives. 6.2(d) Outlook The political atmosphere between the Baltic capitals and Moscow will remain tense over the next few months as local parties try to maintain their credibility in the face of continued work by the popular fronts to press their action programs for independence. Critical points could occur this fall with republic-level elections in Estonia and Latvia or next spring when the fronts in both these republics plan to hold popular congresses that will consider declaring independence. Sajudis candidates in Lithuania are likely to win control of the republic legislature then. 6.2(d) As long as Moscow continues its present course, republic party organizations have a chance of persuading nationalists not to provoke Moscow with calls for secession. The greatest threat to Moscow's policy of accommodation comes from the Russian minorities, who are much more likely than the Balts to attempt to provoke a violent confrontation. If widespread intercommunal violence then resulted, Moscow would declare martial law and use troops to restore order. 6.2(d) Top Secret TCS 2908/89 12 7 September 1989