About Some Aspects of the Population Policy in the Capital of the DPRK, Pyongyang

Through reliable Korean sources it has been revealed that in the past few months a large-scale expulsion campaign has been carried out by the state organs. It is thought to have affected approx. 200,000 citizens. A similar campaign, on the same scale, is known to have occurred in 1975. The goal of these measures, above all, is to prevent a rapid increase in the population of Pyongyang (currently approx. 1.5 million inhabitants), whose material situation is far better than that of provincial inhabitants. Special permits are required for travel to the DPRK capital and the establishment of permanent residency. Until now, DPRK citizens relocated to Pyongyang for official and other reasons have always tried to bring in relatives and acquaintances after them. Another reason seems to lie in the effort to have a politically reliable population in Pyongyang.

Reasons that were given for expulsion:

- disablement (especially cripples),
- serious illnesses
- age (those no longer in the workforce due to age),
- political misconduct,
- immoral conduct (especially marital infidelity)
- insufficient professional achievements.

Fearing an expulsion, the situation among the population in Pyongyang is therefore said to be tense.
